

Human society in some parts of the world is witnessing wars and social tension. Loneliness, sickness, and true love are among the greatest challenges in today's world.

Fratelli Tutti is the encyclical issued by Pope Francis last year, 2020 to press for solidarity, justice, brotherhood oriented on political, social life and human institution, and care for the environment worldwide, as part of the social teaching of the church on fundamental issues of daily human life.

Through the social encyclical we have been called to build on these issues towards the human society. The Pontiff published this document in the midst of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Despite of many great things the Holy Father has touched on, he has emphasized on brotherly love, the main point of the document, whereby he described how love can be a solution to everything, even when a man shows despair due to different circumstances facing him.

The Archbishop of the Archdiocese of Dar es Salaam, Jude Thaddaeus Ruwa'ichi, OFM Cap., said the reading culture has been declining. He insisted on that culture and says there's a need for everyone to read and understand this social encyclical from the Pontiff. The reverend is emphasizing on the following issues:

This document is talking about different challenges in the society as the biggest threat to humanity; like the outcome of COVID-19, wars, poverty, migrants that has led to deaths, loneliness and fear.

In such a scenario man finds himself in a situation that he's lonely, whereby he needs much attention and solidarity from others.

People should live as an example of a Good Samaritan by touching lives of those who encountered difficulties and whose hearts are hurt.

Addressing the call to humanity issued by Pope Francis, Archbishop Ruwa'ichi, OFM Cap, said it was an opportunity for everyone to recognize the presence of others, welcome one another and engage in constructive politics.

It is the time now to build bridges to allow others to cross and not to prevent them by building walls
